A Lovely Tale Of 4 Young Archangels

Once upon a time, in the bright and peaceful realms above, there lived a group of beautiful Archangels who spent their days in joy and harmony.

Serenith was the eldest in appearance, looking about fifteen. She had a calm and gentle presence, with the ability to soothe any living creature. Being near her made everything feel at peace. Beside her was Viridel, a little younger, who had the special gift of bringing dolls and small creations to life for a short while. Then there was Opaline, cheerful and energetic, who could form water from thin air and create soft flames that shimmered like candlelight.

And lastly, there was Amorette, the youngest, who looked about nine years old. Her gift was graceful and quiet—she could restore things. Wilted flowers bloomed again at her touch, wrinkled fabric smoothed out, and even small sadnesses seemed to fade when she was near. It wasn't a loud or powerful ability, but it was beautiful in its own way.

Above them all, they knew, was the Lord Jesus—the true source of all light and goodness.

Though angels do not age like humans, they appear in forms that reflect who they are. Serenith looked older, while Amorette remained small and soft in presence.

One sunny afternoon, the three older angels were walking through Heaven's International Park, where everything shimmered gently under golden light.

After a while, Viridel groaned, "I'm so thirsty."

Opaline laughed and quickly formed small, cool water spheres in her hands. "Here," she said, handing them over. As soon as they tasted them, they felt refreshed. The three of them sat on the clouds for a moment, enjoying the quiet.

Then Serenith said, "We should visit Amorette."

The others agreed right away.

Amorette hadn't been allowed to leave her tower that week. She was the only daughter of the King and Queen, with four older brothers. She was deeply loved—but recently, she had gotten into a bit of trouble. She had taken a few pieces of candy without asking, so she was asked to stay in her tower for a while as a gentle punishment.

"We can't visit her without bringing something," Viridel added.

So they traveled by a silver horse to the largest toy shop in Heaven. Inside, a small angel greeted them kindly.

They asked for a specific doll, but it had already been sold. Instead of being disappointed, they picked out many other toys—dolls, surprises, and small fun items. Serenith paid for everything, but Opaline and Viridel insisted on sharing the cost so it would feel fair for everyone.

Carrying several large bags, they made their way to Amorette's tower.

The tower stood tall and glowing. It wasn't meant to be a prison, but a place for reflection. Guards stood nearby, not to frighten her, but to make sure she stayed where she was meant to be.

The three angels were allowed in after a few checks. In their world, even emotions mattered, so they made sure they weren't carrying anger, sadness, or fear.

Inside, a small angel handed them soft shoes. "Lady Amorette prefers everything to be neat and matching, and she likes everyone who enters her tower to wear this specific brand—even the helpers," she said.

They thanked her and continued down the halls until they reached the playroom. A small bell hung beside the entrance.

Opaline rang it gently.

A few seconds later, Amorette appeared, holding a small white kitten with light blue eyes. She looked super happy to see them.

"Oh my goodness, you're finally here!" she said, smiling. "And look at you all!"

She immediately began commenting on their outfits in her usual teasing way, then said, "Come on, let's fix everything properly first."

She led them to her wardrobe, which was filled with beautiful dresses. Instead of showing off, she helped her friends adjust their outfits. With a soft touch, she smoothed wrinkles and fixed small details. Her ability worked beautifully, making everything look just a little better.

Soon, all four of them were ready, looking neat and elegant in a simple, natural way.

Then came the moment to hand the gifts.

Amorette's eyes lit up as she received them. "You really brought all of this for me?" she said happily. But as they placed everything down, Serenith noticed something.

"One of the bags feels lighter," she said.

They checked—and one toy was missing.

For a moment, they were confused. Guards were informed, and there was some quiet movement around the tower. But Amorette didn't seem upset.

She looked at the toys they still had, then at her friends.

"It's okay," she said softly. "We still have more than enough."

Her calmness made the others feel better.

So they went back to the playroom and started opening the gifts together. They laughed, played, and enjoyed each item. Even without the missing toy, the moment still felt full.

Later, it was discovered that the missing toy had been taken by someone in disguise—someone who didn't belong there. The situation was quickly handled by Heaven's guards.

When the news reached them, Amorette simply nodded.

"I hope she learns to give instead of take someday," she said quietly.

The others didn't say anything, but they understood.

As the day slowly came to an end, the four angels sat together, resting after their time together.

Serenith spoke first. “I thought being generous meant bringing a lot.”

Viridel added, “But I think it’s more about sharing what you have.”

Opaline smiled. “And not letting small things ruin the moment.”

Amorette gently stroked her kitten. “Real generosity doesn’t depend on how much you give,” she said. “It’s about giving with a full heart.”

Soon, it was time to leave.

They said their goodbyes and returned to their homes, each carrying a quiet but important lesson with them.

Because in every world—even in Heaven—the greatest kind of giving isn’t about having more.

It’s about sharing, even when something is missing.
