

East

I kept a ledger of gains along the winding road,
Waiting for the waters I cast to return to my hold.
Yet Christ teaches the thirsty and weary soul:
Give without reward, for Love has made you whole.
Though my garments are stained and my heart bleeds blue,
My cup overflows with Your peace made new.

Now I turn my steps toward the peaceful east,
To greet the new dawn where the dark nights have ceased.
There the rising sun illuminates Your promise so bright,
Washing away sorrow, rekindling hope with its light.
Though our grandest dreams may crumble into dust,
And human efforts fail, as earthly things must,
I run without fear toward the break of Your day,
For Your light leads the broken and guides my way.

Between the rising dawn and these fading days,
Only You, O Lord, are worthy of my praise.
Not in this shifting world where shadows depart,
But in You alone, the anchor of my heart.
Not my will, Father, but Yours be done forever,
For in Your eastern light, hope shall fail us never.
