

Midnight Thoughts

The night sat quietly by my window, wearing a coat of silver rain.

Streetlights trembled on empty roads while the world forgot my name.

I listened to the clock keep breathing, slow and soft against the wall, and wondered how a heart can echo inside a room so small.

The moon spilled secrets on the floorboards, pale as letters never sent,
and every shadow in the corner carried something that it meant.

But somewhere past the sleeping rooftops, beyond the dark and distant blue, morning waited like a promise quiet, patient, true.

Manav Nand

Open Grade

Fiji Agape Mission School

Poetry Writing