

Black Colored Pencil

Eight billion vibrant colored pencils

Dazzling yellow and refreshing blue,
And the red pencil with a heart-burning glow

And then, me.
A black colored pencil, darker than the edge of night.

Neither dazzling nor intense,
Yet a color that reaches to the very depths.
Combine every color in the world, and I am formed;
Upon whatever hue I settle,
In the end, only I remain vivid.

With nothing but pitch-black darkness to my name,
Only I,
Only I am seen.

If I swallow all colors to become myself,
And if only I remain, no matter what I cover—

Now I ask my Creator:
Why must light always be so blindingly bright?

If God gathered all the lights of the world
And placed them within the deepest part of me.

Then I am not merely dark,
I am filled with all the light He made inside of me.

Perhaps black is
Hotter than the sun, deeper than a rose—
The gentlest light allowed by God.

Untouched by the colors of this world,
Vivid as the one God created me to be
-The one and only profound comfort in this world.

A black colored pencil, crafted by His hand,
The gentlest light to heal a broken land.
