Describe the step-by-step procedures used to complete your project:

How to draw a six-panel comic? This is my first time drawing a single-page comic, and I chose a monologue as my plot. But what should the main character's monologue be? We often engage in monologues when we're lost, so I chose a school theme.

First, I conceived the first panel—the environment in which the monologist takes place. Obviously, it's a scene of him hesitating in class about whether to fill an application form. I use a slightly wide-angle perspective and an unbalanced eye-the-shoulder shot, emphasize his hesitation and predicament of the application.

The next 3 panels are his daydreams. A good opportunity to showcase the three scenes in the center of the page.

Next, it's a black panel with radiating pattern, showing he's in a tense crowd (slow-motion shot), looking back in dark.

But as a Christian, he remembers the Bible verse on the classroom wall (the last panel): I Thessalonians 5:16-18. The last scene is without panel divisions: shows he has grasped the truth. Finally, he looks out the window and smiles.
