

Like Water

Is having strong convictions always a good thing?

People say that because I choose to be considerate,
I have no backbone.

Is that really something worth criticizing?

If everyone held tightly to their own convictions,

wouldn't we spend every day
arguing,
each insisting that they alone are right?

I don't like stubborn convictions.

I do believe
we need them to some extent.

But I want to flow
like pure and beautiful water, reflecting the character of God.

Even when my convictions are tested and shaken

I want to love others
as God loves them,

and to be someone who chooses kindness

over pride
