

Where Quiet Paths Begin

(A Shakespearean Sonnet)

I came where every face already knew.

The songs, the roads, the laughter I had missed.

I walked behind, content to watch the view,

While questions gathered softly in the mist.

The loudest voices hurried toward the light;

I learned instead to hear what silence knew.

For hidden stars still guide the longest night,

And faithful hearts grow strong with little view.

The oak does not awaken tall in spring,

Nor rivers find the sea in just one day.

The Lord shapes every season, everything,

Though many steps still wander far astray.

So I will walk where truth outlives applause,

And trust the Hand unseen behind the cause.
